About a Pitcher and More

A Conversation with Inge Mauger

by Antoinette Kranenburg

The stainless steel pitcher is simple and bold, its distinct design the work of Arne Jacobson, noted Danish architect and designer. Sitting out on a side table by the front door, it caught Gary Ditto's eye. After decades of use, its handle had fallen off. Inge Mauger explained she very much wanted to have it repaired and had gone by all the shops, but could not find any place to fix it. "I know someone who can fix it," realized Gary, "Steven Cohen!"

A retired naval architect, Steven Cohen is an amateur metal worker with a workshop at his nearby Kensington home. As a child, Steven was tutored by an experienced, old world machinist, who could repair anything. Sure enough, Mr. Cohen was kind enough to help out and devised a way to reattach the handle. Inge Mauger is very pleased to have her striking pitcher back in use.

Inge Mauger was born and raised in Denmark, so her affinity for Danish sleek modern design comes as no surprise. Arne Jacobson was the architect of the SAS Royal Hotel in Copenhagen, which opened in 1960. Jacobson designed the Hotel inside and out, including all the furnishings, from the salt and pepper shakers to the iconic Swan, Egg and Drop chairs.

Inge is the eldest of five children, with two brothers and two sisters. She grew up on Langeland, an island 25 miles long and 14 miles wide. "It was the countryside, by ferry to Kiel in Germany was an hour away."

During the Second World War as a young child "We could see the sky lit up with the bombing." of Lübeck and Kiel across the Baltic Sea. The sky glittered with strips of foil dropped down from Allied aircraft to interrupt enemy radar.

Inge went to college in Copenhagen for 31/2 years to become a dietitian, living in the hospital dormitory. After graduating she spent a year in London training at St. Thomas Hospital in 1960-61.

She came to Washington, DC in 1965 through the Denmark American Foundation, as a trainee with the Washington Hospital Center. She worked at the old Children's Hospital on13th Street NW between V and W, which was by then old and outdated.

She enjoyed working with her black colleagues, but outside of work, life was segregated and socializing was separate. She went to a black friend's wedding at a Baptist church on a hot day and remembers the fan said, "Vote for Barry."

There were a lot of foreign professionals in Washington for study and internships. "Everybody knew everybody, we met at parties." That is how she met Anthony Mauger from England, a cancer researcher at the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

Interestingly, Anthony had lived in the United Stated before as a young boy. In 1940 Britain arranged with the United States to send over boys in case Britain would be over run, so that some young men would be saved to come back after the war and rebuild Britain.

Anthony, born in 1932, had a cousin in New Hope, Pennsylvania, the landscape and portrait painter, John Folinsbee, a member of the New Hope arts community. That is with whom John and his sister, age 8 and 6, went to live in 1940. Folinsbee painted a beautiful portrait of Anthony Mauger as a young boy, shortly after his arrival. The siblings' stay turned in to five years.

After the war Anthony went back to his parents in England, studied organic chemistry at University of Nottingham. He returned to the United States to do cancer research at NIH.

Inge and Anthony Mauger married in Copenhagen and lived in an apartment on Grubb Road and then bought a house off Georgia Avenue just north of the Beltway in 1972. At that time Holy Cross Hospital and Wheaton Plaza were out in the country. Inge remembers I-270 was a two-lane country road.

Inge loved Kensington's small and unusual specialty stores and moved to the Town in 1985. They found a house built in 1958 by a carpenter and his wife for their own family. It suited their modern tastes beautifully.

2020 Year to Date

This has been a year that will remain in our collective consciousness, but real estate sales in our community have remained strong. Many sellers, for good reasons, have withheld their properties from the market and the pool of purchasers has only grown larger. Hence, every house offered for sale has quickly attracted response from multiple buyers. The Ditto Group has been very active helping buyers and sellers during this trying time.

Train Show Postponed Till 2021

The Covid-19 pandemic is forcing the cancellation of the 2020 Train Show. The National Capital Trackers, Town of Kensington, The Ditto Group, Noyes Children's Library Foundation and the Kensington Historical Society are all sad that the show will not go on this year, but we feel that it is important for everyone to remain safe during this uncertain time. We are all committed to getting the trains back on track in 2021 on Saturday, September 11 and Sunday, September 12.
